SAN FRANCISCO'S NIHON MACHI

San Francisco's Nihon Machi has had three different locations. The first location was near the present Chinatown. It was destroyed in the 1906 Earthquake & Fire. The second site was in the embarcadero and was forced to close down when piers were moved north of the Ferry Building.

The Japanese people began to develop businesses near the Japanese Consulate on Gough Street. Because of the racist attitudes held by many Californians, the Japanese gathered in ethnic communities for support and strength that can be found in unity and numbers.

Then in 1941, Pearl Harbor, Concentration Camps----- These people were evacuated from their homes and communities and sent to far away Concentration Camps.

After World War II, the Japanese Americans returned hom and once again began the long hard work of rebuilding their community.

And now more recently, Urban Renewal has destroyed most of the original buildings. Japanese Americans are involved in trying to rebuild this Nihon Machi with remodeled and/or new structures for stores, shops, businesses, social concerns and religious needs.
